

As China Doubles Down On COVID, Some Have Had Enough

CCPO Note: Now, after nearly three years of living with COVID-19, investigations by Senator Rand Paul, the Epoch Times newspaper, and others have demonstrated indisputable evidence that the SARS-CoV-2 virus was created in a laboratory as a result of illegal gain of function research. Whether the virus' release in late 2019 was intentional or accidental, it is now obvious that this virus was created in order to in turn create a need for a new "vaccine," which in turn led to "vaccine" mandates and "vaccine" passports in many parts of the world.

With lightning speed, the experimental, mRNA injections were deployed globally in early 2020 under Emergency Use Authorizations, without, we now know, any testing for safety or efficacy. We also now know that the "vaccine" does not prevent COVID but it does cause hundreds of side effects, including miscarriages, sterility, death, and likely reduced life span. All of which help fulfill the globalists' stated goal to reduce the global population.

But COVID was and is a multi-pronged attack on humanity. For on the heels of the "vaccine" came the mandates and deployment of the digital vaccine passports in many parts of the world. Many more people took the injections in order to keep their jobs and travel, multiplying the destruction. We now appear to be in a lull of this pressure. Many of the requirements have been relaxed or eliminated as a results of court rulings, public protests, and the no longer hidden reality that the injections do nothing to stop the spread of COVID. Be assured, however, we are not "through" this nightmare, we are only perhaps in the eye of the storm, awaiting the next attack. The Bible tells us what lies ahead, and this article gives us a peek into the globalists' strategy to get there. It is a strategy that uses China, with its overall compliant population, as a test bed for new technology to monitor and control a large population.

First, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) implemented draconian lockdowns and other measures in order to execute a "Zero COVID" policy in their country, a policy that makes no sense from an epidemiological perspective. This article reports how the CCP is now issuing electronic wristbands to monitor the wearer's every movement, supposedly for COVID "contagion control." Smartphone apps communicate "Red" or "Green" COVID neighbor status for each individual. "Red" means stay home, and the bracelet monitors your compliance. As we see in this article, it is easy to change the algorithm for a "Red" alert from COVID status to anything you want – such as participation in social media communications about an upcoming protest.

However, unwilling citizens such as Yu Ting Xu can refuse to wear the device, even simply toss it out the window. Clearly, a permanent biomarker is required to enforce such a system. Biomarker prototypes are being used among willing populations right now. But the Bible foretells a future time when no one on earth will have a choice. The future Antichrist "causes all, the small and the great, and the rich and the poor, and the free men and the slaves, to be given a mark on their right hand or on their forehead, and he provides that no one will be able to buy or to sell, except the one who has the mark, either the name of the beast or the number of his name" (Revelation 13:16, 17). Those who refuse will be executed.

That we are witnessing the rollout this technology, along with many other "signs of the times," reveal that we are fast approaching a future seven-year period in human history often referred to as the Tribulation Period. Christians know that Jesus will appear to take us to be with Him before this time. Will you be one? A few months ago, a box was left outside the door of 34-year-old Yu Ting Xu's* apartment in Beijing. Inside, there was an electronic monitoring wristband and a demand that she wear the wristband at all times as part of the fight against COVID-19 in her residential area. While telling her story over a video call, Yu shuffles about in the background. When she returns to her screen, she is holding up the wristband, which looks like a smartwatch but has a plain white plastic surface instead of a display. "I have never put it on," she said. "I have accepted lockdowns, forced COVID-19 tests and health codes, but this thing feels like surveillance just for the sake of surveillance.” The wristband was the last straw for Yu who is among an increasing number of citizens concerned about the motivation for the Chinese authorities’ expansive use of COVID-19-related technology. “I am afraid that the COVID-19 strategy is starting to be about controlling Chinese people instead of fighting COVID-19,” she told Al Jazeera.

Just a few days before Yu received the wristband, thousands of residents in central China had used social media to organize a protest outside a bank in Zhengzhou. Many had been unable to access their bank deposits at the city’s Yu Zhou Xin Min Sheng Village Bank since April with the bank claiming that the problem was due to “system upgrades.” Fed up with months of excuses, the depositors planned to protest in front of the bank’s headquarters. But the day before, thousands of depositors suddenly found their smartphones buzzing and the health codes on their compulsory COVID-19 apps turning from green to red. Colour changes usually happen when the holder has visited a COVID-19-infected area or been designated a close contact with someone with the virus, and it means that the individual must quarantine immediately. The red codes raised eyebrows.

There had not been a registered COVID-19 outbreak in the province, and the health codes of the family members who accompanied the many depositors to the protest remained green. Beijing has said technology such as the app and wristband are crucial to its zero-COVID strategy and its commitment to stamping out the virus, but the red health codes in Zhengzhou and the electronic wristbands in Beijing have contributed to growing scepticism.

Protection causing harm. When the health code system was implemented in early 2020, rights groups, including Human Rights Watch, warned such digital tools risked breaching the human rights of any Chinese citizen with a smartphone. In the first two years of its operation, those early warnings were largely drowned out by thundering applause at the apparent success of the zero-COVID policy. While many Western countries were stumbling from one chaotic national lockdown to the next, Chinese authorities were able to keep most of China COVID-19-free with targeted lockdowns using digital tools to prevent the infected or potentially infected from spreading the virus.

Today, however, the roles are largely reversed. While most of the world has used vaccination as a way to move on from coronavirus restrictions, China is stuck in a loop of relentless lockdowns in an unrelenting quest to stamp out every COVID-19 outbreak. Despite the wide availability of COVID-19 vaccines and the associated decrease in death rates, Beijing’s zero-COVID policy remains firmly in place with no end in sight.

The Chinese government defends the policy as a well-meaning strategy to protect people. But prolonged lockdowns in cities such as Shanghai have brought with them reports of food shortages, family separations and even the killing of the pets of patients sent to quarantine. In the middle of September, there was outrage when a bus transporting people to a COVID-19 quarantine centre crashed, killing 27 passengers. The accident fed directly into the ongoing discussion in Chinese society about the accumulating costs of the government’s coronavirus policy. “It is the government’s zero-COVID strategy that is killing us, not COVID-19,” one Weibo user declared after the accident. His post was quickly removed by censors.

Censors were initially overwhelmed, however, by the popular uproar that swept through Chinese social media sites following the handling of the bank demonstration in Zhengzhou. What human rights organizations had warned about in 2020 had happened: digital tools supposedly implemented to secure the health of Chinese citizens had instead been used to rob those very citizens of their rights.

More intrusion, less support. Han Wu*, 37, from the southern city of Guangzhou, was among the many Chinese users on Weibo that expressed outrage following the incident in Zhengzhou. Like Yu in Beijing, he also believes that the authorities have gone too far in their pursuit of zero COVID. Han was forced to ...
