Suburban pro-life moms spreading “conspiracy theories” and so-called anti-government suspects were two examples used in proposed training videos on “radicalization” allegedly drafted by the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) days after the Biden administration took office.

According to documents obtained by America First Legal Foundation through a Freedom of Information Act request, the department’s Office of Targeted Violence and Terrorism Prevention outlined training videos that would train bystanders how to report “radicalization suspects” in a Choose Your Own Adventure-style video series.

The document characterized a religiously devout, middle-aged suburban mom “concerned about the welfare of other children including the unborn” and an anti-government dad as potential extremists. Other examples used in the document include a white teenage male who hurls “racial epithets” and flashes a gun at his girlfriend and a young environmental activist.

Reed D. Rubinstein, senior counselor and director of investigations for America First Legal, accused the agency of transforming into a “Stasi-like Deep State internal security apparatus.” “It is a very long way from ‘see something, say something’ regarding an unattended suitcase at the airport to profiling patriotic and politically conservative Americans as abusive parents and domestic terrorists because they oppose abortion on demand and voted for former President Trump,” Rubinstein said in a news release. “The agency is out of control.”

Mike Benz, executive director of Foundation For Online Freedom, said ...
